Invention This invention relates generally to contact center management systems, and more specifically to a system and method for optimizing performance of contact centers. 2.
Description of the Prior Art Contact centers (also known as xe2x80x9ccenterxe2x80x9d) are used by many organizations for performing outbound (sometimes referred to as xe2x80x9cinboundxe2x80x9d) sales activities, such as telemarketing. They have become an important part of many businesses"" revenue streams. Their benefit is that they provide one or more centralized points for obtaining information from customers regarding their needs and, in turn, using that information to direct sales activities. Many organizations are constantly trying to improve the performance of contact centers in order to increase their efficiency, and to serve their customers better. Different criteria can be used to evaluate the performance of a contact center. For example, some criteria consider the number of days customers wait for contact center agents; the number of calls answered by an agent; the number of calls answered by an agent who is successful in engaging the customer and in completing the transaction; the number of calls answered by an agent who does not engage
